The old father Augus I tine complained of the multitude of idle ceremonies by which, even at that time, he saw the minds and consciences of men oppressed. These men, as if God regarded nought beside, have so increased the number of ceremonies beyond measure, that scarcely any thing else is left in their churches and devotions. The old father Augustineg denies that it is according to the law of God for a monk to spend his days in sloth and ease, and, under the pretext of sanctity, to live upon the means of others; and the old father Apollonius says of such an one, that he is akin to a thief. These men have, shall I say herds or flocks of monks, who, although they do nothing, and do not so much as pretend to, or profess any...
